My thought is that Doppler Effect deals with relative frequencies and measurements are always made with respect to the line-of-sight (or other reference frame). So, in my thought experiment I am imagining a perfectly rigid, non-moving reference frame that is perfectly transparent to light, as in an idealization. In this world, a particle is moving very slowly. Ignoring relativity for a moment, in this world the measured frequency would be reduced by a factor of  $\frac{v}{c} \approx \frac{v}{c} \frac{c}{v}$  Therefore, the line-of-sight should be referred to the moving particle. In this world, I can imagine this being accounted for by looking at the particle in its own frame. Thus, I would calculate the Doppler Shift for this new (reference frame) frame and move this to the "line-of-sight". Wouldn't this be incorrect? The idea I have in my head is that  $\frac{v}{c}$  should be measured with  $\frac{1}{c} \frac{v}{c}$
