Camera Raw. The ability to take raw images, and process them in a separate application, is an important consideration for those who take most of their images on digital still or video cameras and never print them. The Camera Raw functionality in Photoshop, which allows for the raw processing of images from cameras other than Photoshop, is a very helpful tool. Like many features of Photoshop, though, it can be tricky to understand. Figure 24-2 shows a screen that's been opened in Camera Raw. (The figure shown in Figure 24-2 is a screen shot.) Figure 24-2. Open the controls for Camera Raw in the window shown here. You can manage each color channel of the RAW image that you're working with in this window. You can also create, transform, and manipulate color in the same way you do in Photoshop, which is another way you can use Photoshop as an all-purpose image editing software. (The Encyclopedia of Photoshop is a great book to read if you want to learn this side of the program.) Figure 24-3. Use the histogram to get a sense of how light and dark the image is. This is a simple, unsaturated image. Photoshop can be used for various image types. Your first step is to decide which one of the most basic types you're most comfortable working with (such as JPEG, TIFF, BMP, or TIFF with compression). ## Basic Image Types Image file types are discussed in detail in Chapter 20, but here are a few to keep in mind: JPEG. JPEG is a type of file format that's supported by most digital cameras, as well as by computer imaging devices. It's the most widely used digital image file format. A JPEG file is a raster image made up of pixels. Figure 24-4 shows a common JPEG file. JPEG is good for fine and still photography because its compression results in loss of fine details. Figure 24-4. JPEG format is an excellent file type for storing pictures. JPEG is good for still photography because it's very lossy. TIFF. Most of the professional imaging devices produce a TIFF file, and Photoshop supports it. This format is useful for portrait and other high-quality printing because it can produce a very fine-grained image that can hold a lot of information. Any loss in image quality results in the quality of the actual printed

North Korea's Supreme Leader Kim Jong Un has given permission to 2.2 million people to celebrate the country's newest landmark. The celebrations are to be held across the entire country on Sunday. They involve a music festival dubbed "The Day of the Sun", as well as a parade that will be broadcast live on state television. The holiday celebrates the 105th anniversary of the birth of the founder of the state, Kim Il Sung, and the 80th anniversary of the founding of the ruling party. The festivities in Pyongyang are to be the culmination of the celebrations. During the parade, four models - each representing the three revolutionary principles of the party and the nation - will be carried in a 700-metre march through the streets, accompanied by children's songs and dances. There will also be mass performances of the "Alone We Cannot Fight" revolutionary songs, which were first sung in a mass performance in 1945. The performers will sing the songs as they dance across the square, accompanied by live music played on a huge stage behind them. The images of the parade will be broadcast on state television, as will a film about the performance in Pyongyang on Sunday. North Korea's film-makers often produce lavish footage to show off the country at international events. Other countries have restricted access to the footage, however, and those at home will be kept largely in the dark. Sunday's celebration may be the biggest - with an estimated 2.2 million participants from the whole country - since the 1994 death of Kim Il Sung, Kim Jong Un's grandfather. Western diplomats have said there is evidence that the mass games in Pyongyang on July 9 will be larger than the performances scheduled for the 65th anniversary of the Korean Worker's Party in April. The foreign ministry in Beijing said that the event was being watched with interest "to see what kind of show and what the message is". North Korea has said that the games will be a different type of celebration to the "mass games" held on May 9 at the May Day Stadium, a venue built for the PyeongChang Olympics. The official Korean Central News Agency (KCNA) reported that "all citizens of the DPRK are urged to do their utmost to take part in the grand performance through their votes and prayers for the well-being of the leader, Supreme Commander of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea". The country's young leader,
