XPinger is a small software application whose purpose is to help you carry out ping tasks to check if your Internet connection is active. It allows you to monitor your Internet connection using simple actions. The tool can be deployed on all Windows flavors out there. I tried XPinger on my Linux distro, Arch, and it worked fine, however, the Windows version doesn't seem to work for me. The *nix version and the Windows version couldn't resolve my internal hosts. The arch version worked ok. What is this, and what good is it if you can't use it? 2 It's not a good application. It doesn't add any value over trying to do it manually. The interface is plain ugly and unresponsive. It also doesn't keep a history of your pings, which is against the whole idea of the application. These are the very basic things that are missing. What is this, and what good is it if you can't use it? I'm using it on Windows 7, the software interface is super irritating. Even changing the frequency for 'ping google.com' takes a minute to respond to any of my clicks. There are no settings to even adjust. I have to add it to the system tray, but it doesn't even tell you how many milliseconds 'ping' takes to complete, it's just pure analytics. I also tried on Windows 8, and it wouldn't even listen to the ping commands, no matter what I did. Not even the system tray icon would show up. What is this, and what good is it if you can't use it? The purpose of this application is to see if your computer is running a TCP/IP connection. You specify what IP address you want to ping (like Google), as well as the frequency of pings and the maximum amount of data you want to send, and the application will keep a log for you. What is this, and what good is it if you can't use it? XPinger (XTerm

The developers of the application put an emphasis on cleaning up the interface from the original tool, which is known as ping to the experts. It looks fine but is it a fun tool to use? It does not create any kind of visual vibes. It is visually slow and some interaction options were not included at all. I purchased this on a whim and was not sure why, but it's an interesting little utility. It's the visual package, that's for sure. But is it a fun utility to use? I'm going to go with a definite nope. After playing with it for a few minutes, I remembered what I had to do. So, how do I set it up? First, it had a little interface window where I would enter the name, then the location, protocol, and then the host (if there was one). I would add host for
