In normal pregnancies, trophoblast invasion of maternal uterine spiral arteries is associated with the expression of enzymes that regulate the synthesis and breakdown of cellular proteins. The activity of these enzymes decreases in spontaneous abortion as compared to normal pregnancy. From previous studies, it appears that lysosomes and/or proteasomes are the primary sites for the degradation of proteins. Inhibition of lysosomal function has been shown to alter the composition of secretory products from cervical carcinoma cells. The authors have hypothesized that blocking trophoblast cell degradation by inhibiting proteasome activity will alter the composition of trophoblast-derived
