☐ Implements searching for alternate streams and allows to delete them. ☐ Supports latest Windows version (2000, 2003, Vista, 2008, 8, and 10). Screenshots: ☐ V2.0: ☐ V2.5: ☐ V3.0: Blood pressure, electrolyte and hormone regulation in hibernating female ground squirrels. Adrenalectomized female ground squirrels (Citellus tridecemlineatus) may enter hibernation when given 12 or 14 hr of light (LD) daily but when given 18 hr of light (LD18) they do not hibernate and diuresis persists throughout the winter. Blood pressure and electrolyte regulation in these squirrels was studied during various photoperiods. When aroused from hibernation, diuresis began shortly after light onset, reaching a peak and declining by late afternoon or evening. In LD squirrels, blood pressure declined from the diuresis peak and reached a minimum by midnight. Both LD and LD18 animals exhibited increases in blood pressure during the diuresis, and declines in blood pressure during the dark phase. There were no significant differences in these blood pressure and electrolyte data between LD and LD18 animals. Neither plasma ACTH nor arginine vasopressin (AVP) levels showed significant changes during the day, but diuresis elicited by light onset was associated with a significant increase in both plasma ACTH and AVP in LD squirrels. In the LD18 squirrels, diuresis was associated with a peak in plasma AVP during the early dark phase, but not with a peak in plasma ACTH. In LD18 squirrels, plasma AVP and corticosterone were unchanged during the light period, but both plasma AVP and corticosterone were significantly increased during the dark period. In LD18 squirrels, plasma AVP remained significantly elevated throughout the dark period whereas corticosterone levels declined to very low levels in early dark. Blood sodium concentration was lowest in LD animals during the light period and then increased during the dark period, reaching a nadir between midnight and 0800. In LD18 squirrels, nadir values were obtained during the early dark period, as in LD squirrels. These data suggest that while LH secretion is required for induction of hibernation, it is not a necessary condition for the maintenance of diuresis. The University of Houston has placed several administrators on administrative leave after a student protester hanged herself from a highway overpass. University spokeswoman Cynthia Haimerl said Tuesday that four members of the university's personnel office have been placed on leave after the incident on the New Orleans side of the George Bush Turnpike on Dec. 11. The incident occurred after a group of black students staged
