I have looked through a lot of posts but I cannot find an answer. I am trying to control a servo using the Sparkfun PWM library. I have the Arduino Mega with it installed. It is a Uno like board. I have the library installed and I can make the servo rotate fine using the code in the library. However, I cannot make the servo accelerate or decelerate. I want to make the servo accelerate over a set distance and then stop when the distance is reached. I have the PWM pins connected to the Servo through the library. I tried testing out the acceleration by setting the output of the library to 0, 0.01, 0.1, 0.5, 1, and 5 and the servo would rotate quickly back and forth a couple of times and then stop. I cannot, for the life of me, figure out what is wrong. It's driving me nuts. I've tried things like setting the period to be very short and then bigger values. I've tried the exact settings that the library uses and I cannot get it to work. I'd appreciate it if someone could help me figure out what I am doing wrong. A: The library uses a floating point value to represent the pulse width. It is not possible to get an exact value to match an exact distance in microseconds. You can try using a constant value that represents a speed of 10, 20, 30, 40 or 50 degrees per microsecond. This will roughly match an exact distance. [The study of the influence of anticonvulsant therapy on the cognitive functions in children with epilepsy]. This work gives the comparative results of the study of cognitive functions in 60 children with epilepsy aged 4-16 years. For research we used two tests: the test on neuropsychological development in children (NPDC, Bernstein and Berenbaum) and the intelligence scale test (WISC III). The obtained results were distributed in 20 groups depending on the disease type, the age, the sex and the duration of the disease. In patients from some groups of the examined children performed the negative influence of anticonvulsive therapy on the results of the neuropsychological examinations. Biological benefits of conducting regular exercise to improve health in humans are well established. However, while many studies have focused on the effect of exercise on human health, relatively little work has been done on the effect of lack
