Helping the user and the game designer

- The game displays an objects which are randomly generated. A set of parameters allows the game designer to override this generation process.
- The objects display properties of the type, the coordinates, their position, etc. The game designer also has the right to randomly modify the value of these objects.
- A maximum of two objects can be displayed at the same time on the screen. The game designer can decide how many objects he/she wants to generate before the screen is frozen and how many objects he/she wants to display on the screen at the moment.
- When the objects are generated the game designer has to decide for each object if the game is won or if it is lost and he has to click on the corresponding dot.
- When an object has been selected the game designer can choose if he/she wants to display the information of the object in a list or in a table.
- If the game is lost then a boolean flag is activated. The user is enabled to keep playing.
