An understanding of the process of nitrogen (N) fixation by bacteria is particularly relevant to the nitrogen cycle, which is a key component of global ecology. Desulfovibrio is a remarkable group of bacteria that form symbiotic associations with eukaryotic hosts, but which have also been described as both free-living organisms and parasites of their hosts. Desulfovibrio spp. have been identified in a variety of environments and can contribute to the N-cycling process in both terrestrial and aquatic environments. Their capacity to use different N compounds as electron donors, either reducing nitrate or ammonium ions, has been useful for understanding both the ecology and biogeochemistry of these processes. However, a recent study of a genome sequence revealed that Desulfovibrio, which had been previously known as an obligate parasite, does not have a respiratory chain in its membrane-bound electron transport chain. These findings have potentially profound implications in relation to the biogeochemical and microbiological processes within the near-Earth environment. The present review examines the knowledge currently available on Desulfovibrio, including the occurrence and role in biogeochemical processes in relation to N-fixation and their potential role as a model for a metabolic symbiosis.
