A couple of major movements are upon us in the climate science community this week. First, tens of thousands of people are participating in the largest climate demonstration ever, and over 1,000 are participating in the Earth Day March on Washington this Sunday. In other words, the need to act on climate is no longer a debate. It's a fact. It's a moral obligation. But you'd never know that by listening to some prominent climate deniers. While that might sound a bit paradoxical (and they are a small minority), the truth is that there are some climate scientists who still disagree, and deny, that global warming is a real and growing problem. These scientists, and the politicians they support, are wrong. But they're not going to learn the truth simply by reading a story on Yahoo! News. So for you and for me, it's time to join the fight. Meet the climate skeptics: They're not totally wrong. Let me explain. Defining climate skepticism First, let's talk about definitions. If I say climate skeptics (also known as climate change deniers) are wrong, I'm only saying that some of them are saying things that are factually inaccurate. But not all skeptics are wrong. For example, there are scientists, like me, who believe that not enough evidence exists yet to say that anthropogenic (human-caused) global warming is necessarily the dominant cause of recent climate change. Because there 0cc13bf012
