NYC...Are Indian health policies really evidence-based? With limited resources, it is not surprising that resource-poor countries focus on interventions that have the best evidence of effectiveness. In contrast, in middle-income countries, health systems are often financed with resources derived from the first-world public health system. In these countries, there is a tendency to 'cherry pick' interventions with strong evidence of effectiveness and avoid those with weak evidence of effectiveness. In this article, we argue that if efforts are made to produce evidence-based policies in India, the'relevant window of opportunity' for reducing the burden of chronic diseases will be missed. This is because although evidence-based policies could come from a combination of both contemporary 'best' and backward-looking evidence, such policies cannot be implemented unless contemporary evidence is available. It is likely that evidence-based policies will be generated primarily through innovative combinations of traditional and contemporary knowledge rather than by mere backward-looking evidence alone. Within India, there is an urgent need to generate contemporary evidence about the effectiveness of policy interventions. Furthermore, policy makers should not remain ignorant of the international body of evidence about policy effectiveness. In addition to contemporary evidence, policy makers should develop systems of knowledge translation that can maximize the impact of strong evidence on practice in India.Q: Does releasing memory allocated using new[] ever cause a memory leak? I have been trying to solve the problem in this question for a while now and it appears to me that there are several ways to go about this. Here are some scenarios I've tried: free the ptr returned by new[], free the ptr returned by malloc, free ptr returned by new[] (this way, when I call delete[] on it later, I'll get a memory leak). create a pointer to the array, allocate memory for it, and then store that pointer in the new array The second approach seems the most logical to me, but C++ has a double free() problem (only single free()'s don't cause a leak). So I'm not too sure what the best way to solve this is. Any thoughts? A: Yes, if you allocate it using new[], and never use delete[]. However, you cannot allocate using new[], use the return b7e8fdf5c8
