Texas school district told to stop banning students from DREAMer march By Nigel Duara, Texas Tribune Updated: June 4, 2015 The Texas school district said there is no policy in place for student participation in public events. The policy for the Dallas Independent School District has been in place since 2007. "The policy simply prohibits (district) students from participating in any campaign that is not school-related," a statement from the school district read, according to Bloomberg. "There is no policy prohibiting (district) students from participating in campaigns that are school-related, as there are for students who are not (district) students." The policy does not specifically mention the DREAMer march planned for Dallas that has attracted national attention. A school board member, Sissy Stanberry, said the students should not be prevented from taking part in the march simply because they are not in school. "We do not have a blanket policy against the Dallas students marching and promoting themselves in a positive light and the fact that we have no written policy in place for the Dallas Independent School District prohibiting the students from participating at all is a breach of trust and an insult to the students who are truly trying to live up to the American dream of home and education," she said, according to the American-Statesman.T.H.E.
