Currently, I can only answer about 4-5 questions per hour. I know that there are way more questions on the exam and I can't answer all of them in my practice. However, is there a way to figure out which questions are the most important ones? Also, is there a way to practice more effectively? A: There's no way to know which questions are the most important, since all questions are equally important. You can't speed up your practice in any way by reducing your rate, since that means you answer fewer questions, which would make the remaining ones more important. Any practice where you try to do faster than you can, doesn't work because that's actually a way to get slower. If you do something like limiting yourself to 3 questions at one time, then the questions you complete will take a lot longer to answer, and your practice becomes much more complicated. You can however practice by solving as many problems as you can, on every level, every day. Because you're solving problems, it doesn't matter how fast you do it. It also works out much better for your long-term memory, because you are able to solve more problems in a shorter amount of time. What matters most is how many questions you do a day. A day on which you answer 3 questions in 10 minutes, is better than a day on which you spend 50 minutes a day answering 7 questions. If you're feeling stuck, solving a ton of low-level problems is usually the best way to move forward. Whenever you feel stuck, try solving one problem on a very easy level, until it's solved.
