Building a strong foundation of modern medicine The Robert H. Lurie Comprehensive Cancer Center at Northwestern University Feinberg School of Medicine was designed to foster discovery in all areas of cancer research by providing cutting-edge, multidisciplinary basic, translational, and clinical science. It is dedicated to finding new ways to prevent and cure cancer. To that end, the Lurie seeks to engage outstanding scientists across the university to collaborate in cancer research. It helps to recruit these experts by providing them with the resources to excel and thrive as researchers. A distinguished group of scientists from around the world now lead the Lurie's research, and they are poised to improve patient care. More than 160 scientists work on four research programs: Molecular Pathology; Genomic and Epigenomic Pathology; Immunology; and Experimental Therapeutics. The Lurie is also uniquely positioned to treat all cancers through its strong ties to the Northwestern University Health System and Lurie Children's Hospital. For more information on Northwestern's cancer research, visit us in the News section. A biological science PhD in cancer biology, Dr. Heger accepted his first tenure-track position in 2011 and moved to the Lurie. Dr. Heger has conducted research on the tumor microenvironment, long known for its pivotal role in cancer, and the development of novel anti-cancer treatments. A strong team of students and young investigators also leads research at the Lurie. The atmosphere of creativity and collegiality fostered at the Lurie helps to attract new and young scientists. Northwestern's Heger Cancer Institute has received Cancer Center designation by the National Cancer Institute (NCI). An institute is required to have NCI funding, but the designation alone does not indicate that an institute is leading the field in cancer research. It is an honor awarded to some of the nation's most distinguished cancer centers because
