Dystrophic epidermolysis bullosa (DEB) is a rare genodermatosis characterised by blistering, scarring and fragility of the skin. It is subgrouped into types I, II and III. We describe a patient with DEB type III who had blistering for over 20 years and had been misdiagnosed with bullous pemphigoid. The patient was a 48-year-old man with a 25-year history of blistering on his face, neck and trunk. He had a limited number of bullae on his lower limbs and knees; however, he did not have any blisters on his palms or other parts of the body. The blisters on the lower limbs and knees became more serious with age. Histopathology showed that the blister fluid was transparent and contained hyaline material, resulting in misdiagnosis of bullous pemphigoid. We show that the clinical, histopathologic and immunofluorescence data in this patient are consistent with DEB type III.Hand The Hand is an experienced and enthusiastic architect and real-estate developer and is a leading authority on the commercial renovations and the formulation of large scale projects.
